PROLOGUE

The word is Vietnamese for “gift”

In Vietnamese, quà means “gift”. Our founder, Meng Yee, chose the name in 2002 after a journey through Vietnam’s lacquer workshops left her certain of one thing: an object made slowly by hand carries something a mass-produced object cannot: the presence of its maker.

Two decades on, that conviction remains unchanged, even as the relationships we craft for have grown in scale and significance: ministries, airlines, banks and hotels that have hosted heads of state. Each has, at some point, needed to express something an email could not — and chosen to say it in lacquer.

This is more than a product catalogue.
It's a record of what we've learnt about gifting well.

Our founder, Meng Yee

CRAFTSMANSHIP

Layers of lacquer

Every piece begins the same way: a base of wood, and then patience. Natural lacquer is built in coats, each one hand-applied, cured in careful humidity, then water-polished before the next is laid. It's why a finished surface holds a depth no paint can fake, and why no two pieces, however identical the mould, ever come out quite the same.

Sixteen layers. Three months.
Every piece passes through the hands of at least three artisans: one to shape it, one to paint or inlay it, and one to polish it, all to create an object that will be treasured for years to come.

Made by hand, designed to endure.
